

PLAINS, Ga. (AP) — Jimmy: Carter today was to hold his first meeting since the Democratic National Convention with the advisers who helped him capture his party's presidential nomination.

The meeting was set up to discuss campaign strategy and to map plans for the transition to a possible Carter presidency. . .

"In essence, they will talk about how to get from where we are now to a Carter administration," an aide said.

Those at the meeting with the presidential nominee were to include campaign manager Hamilton Jordan; Stu Eizenstat; Jack Watson, an Atlanta attorney handling transition plans; and Dick Moe, administrative assistant to Sen. Walter Mondale, Carter's vice presidential running mate.

The role of Mondale in the fall campaign was high on the meeting's agenda.

Watson, chairman of the Georgia Board of Human Resources, which oversees health and welfare programs, planned to report to Carter on his search for people to serve in a Carter administration, including possible cabinet members, an aide said.

Carter has stayed at home since his return from the convention in New York City last Friday, venturing out only to Sunday school and church and to, visit his sister, Gloria Spann, on Monday.

The AFL-CIO's Executive Council endorsed Carter on Monday, and the former Georgia governor telephoned George Meany, the labor federation's president. to thank him.
